

Gluten Sensitivity

From time to time certain individuals, particularly those diagnosed with celiac disease have expressed concerns regarding skin care products which may contain gluten. While we do not believe that topical products pose a risk, Jan Marini Skin Research recommends that anyone with a medical issue should strictly adhere to their physician’s recommendations. All JMSR skin care products are designed for topical application only and are not meant to be ingested.

Some skin care products may commonly contain wheat protein as a skin conditioning agent. Often the wheat protein does not contain gluten but it is impossible to determine if this is the case. Topically applied products containing gluten have not been shown to adversely affect gluten intolerant individuals. In fact, there are no reputable peer reviewed studies that demonstrate that any topical contact with gluten poses any risk for those who are gluten sensitive or intolerant. Mayo Clinic, one of the definitive sources on gluten sensitivity, states the following:

“Gluten-containing skin care products and cosmetics aren’t a problem unless you accidentally swallow them. Some people develop a form of celiac disease called dermatitis herpetiformis (DH), which causes an itchy, blistering rash. This skin disorder is also linked to gluten intolerance. But although it involves the skin, DH is caused by ingesting gluten, not by skin contacting gluten.”

The following JMSR products contain some form of wheat extract or wheat protein:
